E.

E, the second vowel, and fifth letter in the Greek alphabet, from the Hebrew ע, to which it answers in alphabetical order, and from which it takes its figure; for by turning it to the right hand, to comply with our way of writing, it stands thus Π, and by taking the separate perpending line, and joining it transverse to the foot, that it may answer the top line, we easily form E. There is indeed another figure of the Greek letter, but later, viz. Ε, which our Saxon ancestors borrowed from them without any variation. This letter was both long and short in the old Greek, as it is still in most languages, who pronounce λέγω, and λήγω, though of a quite different sense, and innumerable such words, after the same manner; from which ambiguity often ariseth. To obviate this, and perhaps some other inconveniencies, they invented Η to express the long sound, or, to speak more properly, robbed their alphabet of one of its letters, which were but sixteen, and supplied the want of it by a mark of aspiration, writing εθμός for HETHMOΣ. But this only could supply the want of their banished Η in the beginning of their words, therefore they found themselves under a necessity of inventing three letters more to express it in the middle, namely Θ, Χ, Φ. But of this see more in the letter Η.

To proceed, this letter E in old Greek was pronounced like a, as Ο was sounded like s. In Latin it is changed into, and hath a mutual intercourse with, all its sister vowels, as they with it; into a, as from sero, satus, reor, ratus; so in like manner a into e, as tracto, detrecto; e into i, as emo, eximo, perimo; as in like manner i into e, as eligans was writ by the antients for elegans, as Gellius 11, 2. tells us; and in some words these vowels are writ indifferently, as beri or here. So Augustus and Livy, as we are told by Quintilian, Instit. Orat. 1, 7. took the liberty of writing other words, as sibe and quase for sibi and quasi, supposing this way of writing came nearest to the common pronunciation; for e in Latin, as well as Greek, was pronounced ei; hence the Romans, in the three like Cases of the plural number of the third declension, writ many, if not all, words indifferently in is, es, or eis, as partis, partes, or parteis; and in the accusative and ablative singular of the same declension, in many words these endings are indifferently used, as might be shewn by innumerable examples. That e and o are thus interchangeably used, is evident in pendo, pondus, tego, toga, and in Greek λέγω, λόγος, τρόπος, so in like manner o into e, as from vos is derived vester; to omit that vostrum and vestrum, advorsum and adversum are read in pure writers. Lastly, the same is also observed in e and u, u and e, as in percello, perculi, perculsum; juro, dejero, pejero. In the composition of diphthongs, e is a prepositive only in two words, hei and heu; subjunctive after words innumerable in a, as aedes, ager, &c. Also after o in words from the Greek diphthong oi, as οἶστρος, oestrus, οἰδίππης, Oedipus. In the contracted notes of the antients, E. is put for Est, Ennius, Edilis; E. B. Ejus Bona; E. D. Ejus Domus; E. E. Ejus Etas; E. F. Egregia Femina; Erigere fecit; E. F. vel E. FIL. Ejus filius.

F.

F f Roman, and now in common use, F f Ital. which also is in modern use, ff f in old English, as commonly called, though long after the time of the Saxons, in modern use, but chiefly in acts of parliament and proclamations, the sixth letter in the Hebrew, Latin, and many other alphabets, may seem to have lost its place, and figure in the Greek alphabet now used; but however, its place is supplied in the numerals by ς, which is called Βαυ ἐπισημιον, and its power of being a vowel, consonant, and quiescent letter, which it had in the old Greek alphabet, is still otherwise supplied. This sixth Cadmean letter answering to ς was first turned to the left, as its original, thus, Ϝ, and afterwards to the right F. The Æolians used the former way, and turned it upside down, thus, ϝ. These people used it before soft vowels, writing ϝιϝ for ϝιϝ; for an aspirate, as, ϝαϝ for ϝαϝ, also in the middle of words to stop a gap between two vowels, in order to prevent their collision, as ϝις for ϝις. The old Latins also received it from them, only turning it to the right hand, and setting it upright as we now use it. They, as well as the Æolians, used it for b both in the beginning and middle of words, writing fordeum for bordeum, veso for vebo; and sometimes turned it into v, instead of ϝις, writing ovis, thereby shewing its affinity to the Hebrew vau. This letter being in the form of two r's clapt one upon another, perhaps through the supineness or ignorance of Grammarians, was, and so continues to be, called digamma. Certain it is, there is no affinity between the powers of f and g. In after times, this letter growing into disuse among all the Greeks they cut an o into two parts, the former whereof they clapt upon words which antiently had begun with the letter b, or its substitute ϝ, and the other half upon such as began with a soft vowel. The Latins also, both in the beginning and middle of words aspirated, resumed the old letter b, instead of foctis, writing hostis, and instead of trafo, trabo. But though its place and analogous use favour its descent from the Hebrew vau, yet perhaps as much may be said for its pedigree from the Hebrew ϝ, and so make it difficult to determine in that matter. As to its figure it may be as well formed from ς turning it to the right hand, and adding the middle declining line, as above; or from the final ϝ by turning it, and joining to the middle a small line taken from the top; or from the old Greek Ϝ by taking its short leg, and joining it to the belly. But when we carefully attend to the sound and power of this letter, we cannot but observe that it comes nearer to the sound of ϝ phe, and ϕ phi, than ve and vi, as our Western people sound it. And in Latin words of Hebrew extraction, ϝ is more generally changed into f, than v. Thus from the Hebrew פרה comes the Greek oφ, and the Latin fera; from פור, fors; from פוך, fucus, &c. But since from what hath been said may be gathered its relation to ς in place, and primitive use, and perhaps in its figure, but that in sound at least it seems more nearly related to the Hebrew ϝ or the Greek ϕ, we may conclude it participates of both. And I am inclined to think, that a very probable reason may be given from such a conclusion, why the antient Greeks so early dismissed this letter; namely, because having otherwise supplied the uses it had from the primitive ς, finding its sound nearly related to their ϕ, they concluded they had no farther occasion for it, and so left it out. But whether it comes nearer to v or ph, this is certain, whatever some great men may have argued to the contrary, that it is a mute, and of the first rank also. Nor is it any argument of its being a liquid, that we put e before it, calling it ef, analogous to the liquids el, em, en, er (for so by the way we ought to call that letter, not ar, if we would keep to analogy) whereas in the mutes we pronounce e afterwards, as be, ce, &c. For this custom hath no foundation in the nature of the letter itself, nor in the Hebrew and Greek tongues, who say not ep and eph, but pe and phe, pi and phi; but hath obtained from the hypercriticism, perverseness, ignorance, or inadvertency of Grammarians. And indeed, if this custom would prove it a semivowel, we must also adopt s into the family of the liquids, and, what is still more absurd, make a semivowel of two consonants, whereof at least they confess one to be a mute, namely x, which they call ex, just with as much reason as they call f ef. Besides, f precedes the liquids l and r in the same syllable, as in flos, fraus, &c. and surely in Latin words two liquids cannot begin a syllable. In the notes of the antients F. stands for Filius, Filia, Feci, Frater; F. FA. Filius familiās; FAB. Fabius; FABR. Fabricius; FAC. Factum FAC. C. Faciendum curavit; *F. C. Cum dixi, ficus, rides quasi barbara verba,

Et dici, ficos, Caeciliane, jubet.

Dicemus ficus, quas scimus in arbore nasci;

(Neque enim alibi apud bonae notae auctorem cum adj. vel masc. vel feminino junctum reperiri putò) sed de lectione parum constat, ut neque de interpretatione, vid. Vallam, 1, 4. Non enim reprehenditur Poëta de genere, sed de declinatione; idèoque ficus tuas reponi debere aliqui censent; quod sane, quidem existimaverim, quoniam constat marisca esse adjectivum, cujus etiam m. mariscus & n. mariscum leguntur. Sic intellecto substantivo fuvenalis, Caeduntur tumidae, medico ridente, mariscae, *sc. fici, Sat. 2, 13. & Cato. Ficos mariscas loco cretoso serito, expresse dixit, c. 8. quin & Seneca, Ficos non esset nisi mariscas, Suafor. 12. Et profecto non est Latini moris, mutatà figuratè vocis signif. mutare genus; praesertim in illis, quae ducuntur à similitudine: Lupus sive bestia, sive piscis, sive frenum; lingua sive membrum, sive promontorium, sive herba significatur, non mutat genus, quod & in plurimis aliis observare licet. Esto tamen scripsisse Martialem tuos, non necesse habemus referre ad ficos, sed potius ad filios, famulos, &c. quomodo alibi non semel ficus pro ficosus posuit, vid. n. 4.*

G.

G Latin, Ḡ in the old black English letter, as commonly called, in Hebrew ג, in Greek Γ, in both which tongues it is the third letter, was not in use amongst the Romans till about the second Punic war, being first introduced by Sp. Carvilius, as Plutarch informs us in his 54th Roman Problem; nor did they then admit it into its third place, invaded by the usurper c, now settled by prescription: however, they placed it in a good neighbourhood, between its kindred f and b, which, upon occasion, mutually serve each other. But though c may be justly called an usurper with respect to its order in the alphabet, we must allow it a kind of right, by having been invested with the power and sound of g. For it is certain that the old Romans, who writ pucna and Carthaco, read pugna, and Carthago; otherwise, after the admission of g, they would still have retained the pristine c in these and the like words. If any should ask how the antient Romans could know before this letter g came into use, where and in what words to pronounce either sound? it must be answered, by use alone: For that this might be known so, may be exemplified by an hundred instances in our own language; to give only one, we are at no loss how to sound thit and thatch, the and theme, this and thistle, thou and thousand, thus and thumb; and innumerable words of this kind. This indeed must be owned, that to give several sounds to one and the same letter, makes any language, and particularly our own, as in the above instance, more difficult to be learned, and especially by foreigners. To remedy which inconvenience, the Romans seem to have taken in the letter g. And here I cannot but remark how we have acted the reverse; they took in g, which they had not, to make their own tongue more easy; we have laid aside y and z which we had, to make ours more difficult, which is very unaccountable.

But to proceed; from the Hebrew ג Gimel, which was emphatically called Gamla, from גמל a camel, because of the bunch on its back, the Greeks gave it the name of Gamma: Some think the Latin G received its figure immediately also from the same letter; others from the cognate Γ, which, when turned to the right C, much resembles G. I should think it more probably received its form mediately from the Hebrew ג, I mean from Γ, since, as I before observed, the letter c originally had the power and sound of the after invented g, as well as its own; and so when the Romans admitted it, they might make it with good reason differ no more from c in figure, than in sound. For indeed these letters differ only thus, c is a softer g, as g is an harder c. Hence it comes to pass, that in declining, the harder g before a vowel is before a consonant changed into the softer c, as lego, legi, lectum, ago, egi, actum, &c. not legtum, agtum, which would be too hard. For this reason, jungo, rego, tego, &c. in the perfect tenses, are read before the formative s, juncti, recessi, tecisi, not jungsi, regsi, tegsi; for so, if we may believe Isidor, before the age of Augustus such words were usually writ, not by x: which, being only a more compendious way of writing, made Quintilian say, Instit. 1, 6. the Romans might have been without it; for they might have continued to write cs, or gs, as recessi, apexi. The letter g sometimes also seems related to z, as we write indifferently zinziber, and gingiber. The cognation of this letter and c is so close, that in some words either of them may be used; as Caius, or Gaius; Cneus, or Gneus; vigesimus, or vice-simus, from viginti: and are often changed into each other, for as from viginti, comes vice-simus; so from centum, is derived quingenti. In Greek this letter, being in the middle of the second rank of the mutes, is changed not only into x but χ also; as in the second conjugation, consisting of this order of the mutes, may plainly be observed; as lego, f. lecso, p. lelecha; instead of legso, lelegba, the harder sounds. I cannot forbear to observe here, that both the Greeks and Romans always, and before all vowels, pronounced this letter hard, sounding γένος and genus, γίγας, and gigas, as we do in get and gise, never as we do in generation and ginger; which irregular and uncertain pronunciation of this letter, as well as the cognate c, proves often a great discouragement to those who desire to learn our tongue; and, together with our different sound of the vowels, makes our Latin, though much purer generally than theirs, almost as unintelligible as our English. In the notes of the ancients, G. is put for Gaius, Gellius, gens, genius; GER. Germanus, Germanicus; G. G. Gemina, gessit, gesserunt; GA. Galeria, Gallus, Gallia; G. H.

Hh, English black letter H h, English Saxon h, which seems to have received its figure from its original the Hebrew ה. The Phenicians, most antient Greeks, and Romans, used the same figure with our English H, which in the series of all their alphabets keeps its primitive place, being the eighth letter. The less antient Greeks indeed, not contented that their letter ε should denote both the short and long sounds, as their ancestors were, witness the divine Plato, and his voucher the lately discovered Sigeian monument, having consulted to express the long sound of ε, invested it with the figure and order of this letter, endeavouring to supply the want thereof in their old alphabet by a mark of aspiration over the head of its vowel, writing ἄμε, ἰσθε, &c. instead of the old Ionic ΗΑΜΑ and ΗΟΔΟΣ, endeavouring, I say; for though they did it conveniently over a vowel beginning a word, they have quite left it out in the middle, writing Ευδία and Ταδς, for ΕΝΗΟΔΙΑ and ΤΑΗΟΣ; and where it occurred after the letter ρ, they have attempted it somewhat preposterously for ΡΗΑΜΝΟΣ, ΡΗΗΤΩΡ, ΡΗΠΠΟΣ, &c. writing Ῥάμνος, Ῥήταρ, Ρηρρς, where the mark of aspiration is put before, but sounded after the consonant. This extermination by the Greeks, being very antient, probably was the reason why some of the antient grammarians, and among the rest our great Master Priscian, have controverted its title to be a letter. One argument against it is, that it is only a pure aspiration, having nothing to assert its right to the elementarian family but the figure, which, if sufficient, would also recommend the numeral notes to the same honour. But with due reverence to so great a man, that it has a power, and that it had a name also in the original, and other the most antient dialects thereof, is very evident. Besides, if its being an aspiration proves it to be no letter, the original softer κ and η, which are often not heard in pronunciation, and the rougher γ and η the parent of H, must be exterminated the Hebrew alphabet: and surely he would not have compared h and a numeral mark, had he reflected that the former is an individual part of a syllable, the latter the characteristic of a whole word, two quite different things. But he insists, "If it be a letter, it must either be a vowel, or a consonant." Yea, certainly. And that it is no vowel, though a constant retainer to that family, may be easily granted him; nor will we endeavour to evince its being a liquid, as some have, from its near approach to the nature of a semivowel. But sure it ought not to be excluded the company of the aspirated mutes κ, γ, χ, which antiently were not in the Greek alphabet, and owe their place there purely to their incorporating with this letter. Surely it would be hard to exclude it. H indeed is no other than an hard aspirate, vested with the power of its mother η, and plainly the same as χ, that is, no other than an hard aspiration; and in many Latin words borrowed from the Greeks, is plainly substituted for it, as χαλῶ, halo, χεῶ, bio, χαμαί, bumi, &c. and in Latin michi, nichil, for mibi, nihil; which also may be more plain in the formation of Greek verbs ending in the second order of the mutes, which constitute their second conjugation, with that of the Latin verbs of the same termination; for as πλέω, λέγω, τρέχω, move into ξ in the future tense; so dico, lego, uero, move into xi in the perfect tense. But others think it no letter, because the Latin Poets generally, and the Greek often, neglect it, treating it as if it were not there at all. This argument proves so much, that indeed it proves nothing at all to the purpose: for the final m, together with its vowel, is as much disregarded by the Latin poets; and especially the final s, which even before a consonant, was antiently neglected by both Greek and Roman poets: and indeed our Greek aspiration is frequently in Latin express'd by s, as ἥμι, semi, ἔξ, sex; and are these therefore no letters?

But to proceed: This aspirate is set before all the vowels, as babeo, bebo, bio, honoro, bumeo; but after no consonant, except the three mutes p, c, t, and that only in words of a Greek original, as philosophus, chorus, Theodorus. Servius indeed tells us, the same use had obtained in three Latin words only, viz. sepulchrum, pulcher, orbis; whereof the two first seem to have been so pronounced by some before and in Cicero's time, as he expressly affirms of pulcher. That this way of prefixing and subjoining h to consonants and vowels was indeed used in pronunciation, but condemned by the best judges before Cicero's time, Catullus witnesseth, laughing Arrius to scorn Ep. 82, for the affecting to pronounce chommoda and hinsidias. Cicero truly soon after, knowing very well that the antients used not this aspirate insertion, for some time used to say pulcror, Cetegus, and Kartago, yet seems afterwards to have espoused the aspirate way, at least in some words, as judging the sound more masculine and sprightly; for upon that account, as we partly learn from himself, but more expressly from A. Gellius N. A. 2, 3, this custom was introduced. However, this way, though sparingly, and in few words used at first, grew into such a ridiculous excess, that some said chenturia, cherona, praecho, vid. Quint. Instit. Orat. 1, 5. Concerning the intercourse which h hath with the Aeolic digamma, see the letter F. H. in the notes of the antients, notes hic, haec, hoc, honor, honestus, haeres, homo, habet, hora; HA. Hadrianus, hora; H. AED. Q. C. P. AM. FE. Hoc aedificium, quod cernis, patriae amator fecit; H. B. heres bonorum; HN. bunc, hunc; H. S. corruptly for L. L. S. a sesterce, being the fourth part of their denarius, viz. two pounds, denoted by the L. L. and S. semis, an half; which in the first times of the Empire was worth two-pence in our money.

I J.

I i, and in black English letter I i, Latin I i, Greek with little variation Ι ι, all from the Hebrew י. This vowel having the smallest sound as well as figure, is most fitly suited to low poetical images; as in that of Ovid, Epist. 1, 109.

Nec mihi sunt vires inimicos pellere testis, where you meet with no a, and only once with o and u, but this vowel seven times, and the next small sound e, as it ought, wanting one of that number. But when the subject riseth, as in the sublime, the frequent use of it is to be avoided. For this reason Virgil hath in the Æneid writ olli for illi near twenty times, but never in his Eclogues or Georgics. Hence also comes the frequent change into u by the antients, to strengthen the sound, as Juppiter Optumus Maximus, and many other instances which might be given out of the old manuscripts of Livy, Tully, and Pliny, plainly shew. This vowel in Latin compounds is also substituted for a, as abigo, contingo, deficio, from ago, tango, facio. The sound of this to the next small vowel e is so near, that the Hebrew, and other dialects from that tongue, expressed them both by one character, before the invention of points. And the changes of i into e, and vice versa, in Latin derivatives from Greek, are too obvious not to be observed; as in μίνθη, mentha, τίνος, tingo. Add also, that in many words purely Latin these vowels are writ indifferently, as mage and magis, here and heri; Mage pollens aer, Lucr. 4, 344. Res hodie minor est here quam fuit, Juv. 3, 23. Yea, many words in the accusative and ablative cases sing. of the third declension end in em or im, e or i. Also in our English tongue we write indifferently imploy, ingage, incourage, indeavour, or employ, engage, &c. and many other words of the same kind. In making Latin diphthongs, as in Greek, this vowel is subjunctive to the rest, as in hei, hoi, hui, Ilithyia. In numerals this, as the smallest letter, is put for the smallest number, I, one, II, two, &c. and, set before the note of a larger number, subtracts itself, as IV, four, IX, nine. In the notes of the antients, I. is put for Inter, intra, Junius, Julius; IA. P. Intra provinciam; I. AGL. In angulo; IA. D. Jam diu, jam dudum; IA. S. D. Jam satis dandum; IA. RI. Jam respondi.

J j English and Latin, wanting in the Greek, in Hebrew י, is properly, as the rest of their letters, a consonant, and hath a name as such, though in favour of pronunciation they sometimes use it as a vowel. We, in imitation of them, call i and j by one common name, but with this difference, that they give it a name from its consonant use, we from the vocal. We have indeed invented a different figure for the consonant, which has been too much neglected by old writers and printers. It is pronounced commonly in Latin and English, and by some in Hebrew words, like a soft g; but very faultily, except perhaps in derivatives from the Greek ζ, as Jupiter, from Ζεῦ πάτερ, where it may be allowed that harder sound; its true pronunciation being softer, approaching nearer to that of the vowel, as at this day the Germans and other adjacent nations pronounce it; their jahr, and our pear being sounded alike. The true sound undoubtedly is near to our y before a vowel in the same syllable; and, if we would follow analogy, this letter ought to be called yé, as we say, bé, cé, &c.
